WELLINGTON'S SUBTLE REJO.
Wednesday, 19th October, 1836—Lord Fitzgerald made us laugh at dinner today with a story about John Wilson Croker, whose pertinacity of opinion is well known. He was laying down the law after dinner to the Duke of Wellington, and according to custom asserting the superiority of his own information on all subjects, having even flatly contradicted the duke, who had taken place at the Battle of Waterloo. At last the conversation turned upon the use of percussion caps for muskets of the army, when Croker again maintained a directly opposite opinion to that which was urged by the duke, who at last good humoredly said to him, "My dear Croker, I can yield to your superior information on most points, and you may know a great deal more of what passed at Waterloo than myself, but as a sportsman I will maintain my point about percussion caps."

FATE PICKS HUSBAND

"It's Ridiculous," Mrs. Strauss Says, "to Say Girls Choose Them."

Are there two men in a woman's life—the man she loves and the man she marries? This is the question Juliet Virginia Strauss asks and answers in the current number of the Ladies' Home Journal.

To me the inquiry seems conservative, writes Ethel Lloyd Patterson in the New York Evening Mail. In a woman's life is one man, no man or many men. The woman who loves but one man other than her husband cares for him enough eventually either to overcome or disregard the laws which separate them, or she cares for him so little that, sooner or later, he becomes but one of the many actors who, from season to season, fill the role of love in the puerile, parlor drama of her life. Find the woman who says there have been but two men in her life—her husband and the man she loves—and you will have found the woman who has loved no man—enough.

However, Mrs. Strauss aims not to philosophize, but to prescribe and to instruct. To some women the men they love and the men they marry are no more alike than the lives they live and the lives they dream," Mrs. Strauss declares. "There is here a strong commentary upon the evil of dreaming, which is certainly one of the great mistakes of womanhood. We have no right to dream."

"Life is before us, full of beauty, full of suffering, full of joy, full of sorrow. If we are not big enough to cope with it we should not lay the blame on the other elbow. True, the other fellow may be in a sense to blame, but the deflection of a fellow mortal, even though that fellow mortal be our nearest and dearest, is never a valid excuse for our failing, too."

Yet has not Mrs. Strauss nearly made a nightmare of her woman's dreams? To be sure, brokers may not dream while they sell their bonds, nor beef, but where may a man and a woman meet if it be not in their wonderful dream? To be tall enough to keep one's feet on the ground while one's head is in the clouds—there is the perfect happiness.

However, in another paragraph Mrs. Strauss points out the danger of the sordid dreams which makes a woman cast covetous eyes at the man who might have made the drama come true.

"The great failing of women in the common walks of life is their dissatisfaction with the things they have," she explains. "A woman has a longing and desire for finery and she frets because the man she has married cannot give it to her. Then begins a general dissatisfaction all along the line and finally she comes to regard herself as a fine creature, full of high tastes, yet wedded to an inferior who can never satisfy those tastes."

A majority of the women you meet in poor or common homes will tell you, if they grow confidential, that they have always longed for better "things," but "he" has never been able or else never willing to provide them. This, I insist, is a very unjust attitude on our part, and one that by means of proper education we might come out of.

"In the first place, it is not good taste that makes us long for things; it is bad taste. Good taste is the quality that enables us to make beautiful and harmonious the things we have. It is probably envy, greed for luxury, idle covetousness of what is our neighbor's that lead us to the discouraging conclusion that in other circumstances we might have shone. There is never anything but personal lack of fitness to keep you from being fine."

Which is very true, indeed, but may be carried too far, as, for example, when Mrs. Strauss declares: "If a woman is going to live with a man at all she must as well be the wife of whatever he is." That does not follow at all, because in many instances it would be far better were the woman to make the man the husband of what she is. But that, of course, resolves itself into a struggle for the survival of the fittest.

"But many women," concludes Mrs. Strauss, sadly, "hold themselves in an attitude of fine ladyhood, and regard the laboring person whom they are attached to as an inferior, lamenting the fact that they might have done better."

"You can never do better than just harmonize with your surroundings. There are always soap and water to keep clean with, always a chance for honest work and for straightforward living in the sphere to which you are called. And you are called to the place you are in, not to the place you wish you were in. You are called to be the wife of the man you married; not the wife of the man you wish you had married. Life those your husband for you. Nothing is more ridiculous than to say that a girl chooses her own husband. Circumstances—or fate, if you will—measure out our allotment. But fate cannot compel us to call the verdict she made for us a doom. We can defeat her by our own personal attitude. Especially are the girl children of America in need of plainer notions about the men they love and the men they marry."

So, quite obviously, Juliet Virginia Strauss does not believe in her Bernard Shaw, and marriage, in her eyes, is an institution rather less interesting and somewhat more hazardous than a Christmas stocking.
